

Our spirit is resilient and our service is reliable.

Interstate has implemented a business resiliency plan to keep our services and operations running smoothly, so that we can provide you with the best service possible.

First and foremost, the safety and well-being of our team members, customers and service partners are paramount. We're closely monitoring developments pertaining to the Coronavirus pandemic and are following the guidance of public and private health experts and organizations to ensure we have the right tools and resources in place to meet those goals. We have implemented a series of preventive care measures for our office employees and operations teams, including the sharing of best practices to prevent the spread of disease, sanitizing vehicles and handheld equipment, and suspending non-essential business travel.

Second, and equally important, we're using the latest conferencing and collaboration technology to ensure our corporate employees stay connected – with our customers, with our global service partners and with each other, regardless of where they may be located. Our operations team members (e.g., drivers, movers, warehousemen, etc.) are following recommended health and safety protocols as they go about the business of moving our customers and their possessions efficiently, safely and reliably.

It's not every day that you pick up your family, or your business, and move. We've been helping people do this for over 75 years and our crisis management framework has prepared us to respond to incidents of any type, scope or complexity.

Thank you for continuing to allow us to serve you in this challenging time.
